Abstract

The instructor in a course in German writing offered electronically at the University of Konstanz in Germany to students at the Alexandru Ioan Cuza University of Iasi describes the course. He has used it to teach different styles of writing interactively and to initiate his students in the use of the computer and the Web for the undertaking of research in German literature. He has attempted to structure and to operate his course in such a way as to bring the special characteristics of on-line teaching and learning to the fore and not simply to replicate a traditional course on-line, a frequent situation with on-line teaching and learning.
