

17.6.2026

Author

BANYA, Kingsley

Title

Are private universities the solution to the higher education crisis in sub-Saharan Africa?

Publication year

2001

Source/Footnote

In: Higher education policy. - 14 (2001) 2, S. 161 - 174

Inventory number

13352

Keywords

Entwicklungsländer ; Ausland : Afrika : Hochschulwesen allgemein ; Ausland : Kenia : einzelne Hochschulen ; Ausland : Tansania ; Ausland : Liberia ; Ausland : Zaire ; Ausland : Simbabwe

Abstract

Although comparatively young, state universities in sub-Saharan Africa have accomplished alot. They have almost replaced expatriate faculty with indigenous staff and help foster intellectual communities. Some have developed relevant curricula and have produced the skilled human resources required to staff and manage public and private institutes. However, universities in the sub-region face formidable problems, viz: increased enrollments; fiscal challenges, quality issues and rising graduate unemployment. To help solve some of these problems, private universities are increasingly been seen as alternative routes to higher achievement. Based on emprical data, this paper examines some of the challenges/opportunities that private universities face in sub-Saharan Africa. (HRK / Abstract übernommen) Banya, Kingsley, E-Mail: bvanyak@fiu.edu