Abstract

Many regional and local Departments of Education in many countries now require their primary school teachers to be mandatory reporters of child sexual abuse. However, many student?teachers are not provided with courses on child protection and its policy requirements during their pre-service university education. So, how do student?teachers source, and develop, their professional information about this important role? This study examines an Australian university cohort of final 4th year bachelor of education primary school student?teachers, asking them to identify and clarify the nature of any relevant professional information they accessed over the 4 years of their teacher education. The results show that, in the absence of formal child protection courses, such professional information was scarce and sporadic. Student?teachers consistently indicated a pattern of not learning about essential Department of Education policies and procedures whilst at university. These results, although
